It was not unreasonable for the Magistrate Judge to conclude that further - 21 - durational time was not necessary. In short, the Magistrate Judge considered all the relevant factors, weighed them appropriately, and chose a reasonable course of action. It is not appropriate for this court to second-guess such a decision. * * * The arguments of the Appellees in this appeal are without merit. The order of the Magistrate Judge denying Appellees’ motion to dismiss and denying Appellees’ motion for summary judgment will be affirmed. d0c515b9f4

I've been to several of them before, but the ones in Denver were different, mostly because I visited a fair number of industry labs with ECR (Engineering & Consulting with Research), and I ended up having more conversations with people from the industry than I would have expected. I also noticed a lot of my old friends from the oil and gas chemical engineering world were in Colorado, both attending the ACS meeting and signing up for the Professional Development Program sponsored by the society. I never realized how much a lot of people I went to school with were spread across the USA. The conference itself was fantastic. My first time participating, I had a fabulous time (I think I found most of the activities and material). This year's theme was Chemistry for Energy & Environment; you can read more about it here. The highlights for me were the plenary sessions. These were about a half hour talks given by scientists or other engineers

Say I have a string variable in Perl with a value of "hello world". I would like to take this, and use the as a delimiter when splitting the string. That is, I would like my string to be split like this: $string = "hello world"; $string =~ s/ //g; $string_1 = "hello"; $string_2 = "world"; How do I do this without having the delimiter in the string itself? A: You can use a regex in the s/// operator to define what character it uses for the split. For example, using $string = "hello world"; $string =~ s/\ //g; $string = "hello". join("", split / /, $string); produces hello world though the notation you've used for splitting a string is obsolete in modern Perl. [The effectiveness of using drugs during and following the puerperium]. The paper analyzes the effectiveness of various drugs used by 119 women with puerperal period. Before delivery the patients were given a course of cefaclor, fenamid, or calcium pantothenate. During puerperium they were given a course of echinacin or erythromycin and at the end of the lactation they were given 500 mg of calcium pantothenate daily. At the end of the lactation the patients were given erythromycin or cefaclor. It was established that the choice of the antibiotic during the puerperium influenced the rate of negative puerperal results
