(Windows 7) The following versions of Windows 7, 10 are available. are available in both 32- and 64-bit versions, although we recommend that Q: Constructor is never called when implementing interface I have an interface and a implementation. As I am new to C#, I am not sure about the correct way to implement this. I want to know how to make constructor of the class is being called. Here is the code interface IFoo { void foo(); } class Bar: IFoo { public Bar() { foo(); } void IFoo.foo() { Console.WriteLine("This is foo!"); } } The following is the main() method which calls the constructor of Bar. But it does not print "This is foo!" class Program { static void Main(string[] args) { IFoo foo = new Bar(); } } So why constructor of the Bar is not being called? A: Your Bar class doesn't have a public constructor. It's not possible to create an instance of it. You can only create an instance of it via the new operator. new Bar() creates a new instance of it, and that has a default constructor because it's specified in the class. If you want to call the constructor, then you should do that explicitly: static void Main(string[] args) { IFoo foo = new Occ13bf012
