Background: Smokers have reported a wide range of acute and chronic respiratory symptoms after moderate-to-severe allergic reactions to foods, airborne allergens, drugs, chemicals, and other substances. This cluster has been labeled latex-bronchospasm syndrome (LBS), and we hypothesize that acute effects of allergen-specific IgE are responsible for acute respiratory symptoms. While airway reactivity has been directly linked to allergic inflammation, the relationship between inflammation and bronchoconstriction in the context of allergic inflammation has not been defined. Methods: We systematically collected nocturnal, overnight bronchial hyperreactivity (BHR) using precision-cut lung slices. Using a mouse model of ovalbumin (OVA)-induced allergic airway inflammation, we measured allergen-specific IgE on day 9 and BHR and airway inflammation on days 7 and 14. Airway contractility was induced using a proprietary high-throughput bronchoconstriction assay. Clustering of the results was performed using SIMLR, a semi-supervised, non-negative matrix factorization algorithm, which revealed two distinct clusters of airway contractility profiles. Analysis of variance compared the two clusters of airway contractility profiles for independent variables, including day and OVA treatment. Results: While OVA-induced airway inflammation and BHR were comparable in both groups, a substantial decrease in contractility was identified in slices from the LBS group. Moreover, the variation in contractility within the LBS group was stronger than between the two groups. Conclusions: Acute contractility appears to be inhibited early in the allergic response, in addition to airway hyperresponsiveness being exacerbated, suggesting that there is a regulatory pathway between the two. In conjunction with an inflammatory response, these early changes may be responsible for symptoms of LBS. Understanding of Photo: Pixabay. A "Love Notification" app for training social skills went viral after it was shared on WeChat, China's top-rated instant messaging app, by a female university student who said she was dissatisfied with her boyfriend. The "Social Skills Correction" app allows users to register their romantic relationships and then rate the confidence level of interactions with their current partners on a five-point scale. After having the app installed for just two days, the Love Notification app was downloaded by more than 10 million people and had more than 1,000,000 likes and 5,000,000 comments on WeChat, the messages' service. Currently, there are just two functions in the Love Notification app, but future updates will include functions such as: rating behaviours and matching capabilities. The story sparked endless discussions on the Internet, as many people pointed out the glaring contradiction between someone's social skills and their physical appearance. In an era of social media, many people share their daily life and even the intimate details of their daily lives on the Internet. But the key to building a healthy relationship is that people don't just take what they see in social media as reality. "People might have problems in many aspects of their lives, whether it is their appearance, their self-confidence or even their interpersonal skills, but the most important thing is that they have a positive attitude and are confident and content d0c515b9f4
