Q: Under what circumstance would the identity line get exchanged with the null line in classical linear regression? In classical linear regression, the model is $Y = \mu + X\beta$, where μ is the mean of Y and X is the matrix of covariates. From my understanding of the model, it is assumed that the actual values of Y is always bigger than the mean of Y (i.e., is always positive). If this assumption is false, then the line $\mu + X\beta$ would be an undefined line, therefore the identity line is exchanged with the null line and the intercept becomes b_0 . How can this be possible when the assumptions of classical linear regression is always true, or is my understanding wrong?

A: From my understanding of the model, it is assumed that the actual values of Y is always bigger than the mean of Y (i.e., is always positive).

But what is that β supposed to represent, if not a regression coefficient?

So if Y is by definition positive, that means the whole thing is $(Y - \mu)\beta$.

The vector $(Y - \mu)\beta$ isn't always larger than μ . It might seem you have conflated the difference between the mean of Y and the mean of $(Y - \mu)\beta$. But note that the mean of $(Y - \mu)\beta$ isn't the same as the mean of Y , because the $(Y - \mu)\beta$ represents the effect of some covariates on β . You are right in saying $\mu + X\beta$ is undefined if Y is not positive. But that's a different story. Then the intercept would be $b_0 = \mu$. A: So the line is not undefined, it's still valid.
